

The Woman's College of
The University of North Carolina
LIBRARY

CQ
no. 479

COLLEGE COLLECTION

Gift of
Sheelah Ann Clarkson

CLARKSON, SHEELAH ANN. Lady With Unicorn. (1967) Directed by:
Dr. Robert Watson pp. 32

This thesis consists of twenty-six poems. The poems vary in formality and subject but are essentially about defining human conditions within the frame of language. Most of the poems tell a story. The story they tell may be the poem or, perhaps, the speaker of the poem. With the exception of two sonnets and a sestina, the poems in this volume are free verse.

Approved by

A Thesis Submitted to the Faculty of the Graduate School at the University of North Carolina at Greensboro
in Partial Fulfillment
of the Requirements for the Degree
Master of Fine Arts

Submitted
May 1967

Approved by

Director

LADY WITH UNICORN

by

Sheelah Ann Clarkson

A Thesis Submitted to
the Faculty of the Graduate School at
The University of North Carolina at Greensboro
in Partial Fulfillment
of the Requirements for the Degree
Master of Fine Arts

Greensboro
May 1967

Approved by

Robert Watson

Director

APPROVAL SHEET

This thesis has been approved by the following committee of the Faculty of the Graduate School at The University of North Carolina at Greensboro:

Thesis
Director

Robert Watson

Oral Examination
Committee Members

Ed Chappell
Arthur W Dixon
Gilbert K Carpenter
Robert Watson

May 3, 1967

Date of examination

TABLE OF CONTENTS

| | Page |
|----------------------------------|------|
| THRENODY | 1 |
| JUST A THOUGHT | 2 |
| REVELRY | 3 |
| THE VIOLIN | 4 |
| ELEGY | 5 |
| TO A POET | 9 |
| THE VIOLIN MAKER | 10 |
| IN SPRING | 11 |
| REFRACTION | 12 |
| CLAUDE FINKLESTEIN | 13 |
| REDUCTIO AD ABSURDUM | 14 |
| EVENING SONG | 16 |
| A SAD TALE | 17 |
| AT WIDOW'S WALK | 18 |
| SONG OF SAPPHO'S LOVER | 19 |
| THE FIGHTING MAN | 21 |
| DECEMBER FROST | 22 |
| ON FIRE | 23 |
| SOMETIMES | 24 |
| FOR LYDIA | 25 |
| PASSUS | 26 |
| SELF-LAMENT | 27 |

| | Page |
|-----------------------------------|------|
| DISORDERING OF JUDITH | 28 |
| NON-ESOTERIC REVELATION | 29 |
| THE FOOTHILLS IN WINTER | 30 |
| SESTINA | 31 |

THRENODY

Anyone can sing the beauty of these glass wrought hills
these murrhine valleys, poured from the silver goblet of spring. But I shall sing, in my rasping throat, the song of a moth to the end of a thread.

JUST A THOUGHT

What I wanted to say
last night when we were driving through the dark where white horses sleeping could not know that we were passing beneath the autumn ghosts of hackberry trees and unwinding 320 horses for the purpose of adventure, but what I wanted to say was I think it positively grand that the two of us--you and I-- are forever and eternally damned.

REVELRY

Heady with wine we made for Maxy's and Willsonia kept saying how it had rained so hard-as-hell all day we'd better take Thickety Creek Bridge, which was higher ground but a longer way while Nate played "There Ain't No Flys On Jesus" on the Jew's Harp till we got to Maxy's which had closed. We all piled out and sat on the grass. Somebody kept saying how war is inhuman and Frank sang Arias in Italian till his throat got hoarse and then everyone wanted to talk about poets and I got sick on some Azaleas and went to sleep.
When I woke up Willsonia was following the center line back to Nashville.
All the way home I kept thinking of bay leaves.

THE VIOLIN

Only Italy has loved you well.
Your great lovers have been recorded as sure as flying fingers upon your neck have driven away tones of sadness.
Stradivari, Amati, and Guarneri, magic names of love for you.
Some say your age has died and place you, unthinkingly, away in gold lined cases, covering you with silk cloth.
But I have seen you fondled by the old music masters, tucked under the elbow of a worn coat, slowly coming through the rainy streets to a music hall. For some you have been no more than a place for the world to rest its chin.
Yet those bright men from any age lean their faces upon your body, lower their eyes at your name.

ELEGY

(To the memory of Edwin S. Godsey who died Jan. 1966, by ice)

The crowds come with their loud lips and staring eyes and in a room I am silent.
Not one given to prophetic musings I am perplexed to feel a strange spirit in this room moving around the vacant chairs, desk, walls.
Moving against me it does not speak but murmurs soft as rain and rubs its small fingers against my face.
I know that his eyes are deeper than all roses and only the earth knows his name.

II

We met later,
I much older than you
and feeling my years.
You said, "It's our loss,
a tragedy." And I agreed.
I said, "It was inevitable."
You disagreed.
How could I explain that the death card had turned its face upward upon the dull table?
You frowned, you said,
only, simply,

"Why?"

and I could not answer.

Father, I wish that I might.

That I might rend the veil and pulling it back find what visions are given to great men. That I might enumerate upon the icy fingers

(now long dead) the ways the world works to purge itself.

"A bit of the sacrificial lamb,"

I might have said. But,

being frightened of your wondrous heart, I talked of venerable green and privet hedges.

You nodded.

What must you think?

You who are willing to give

so much of yourself to me who am willing to record so little?

Would you have me sing for Lycidus while you weep?

III

What I would like to have said to you that day we talked, was the love I have for the death of angels and hackberry trees.

One prays only for those one loves to die utterly.
Dying they make make us possibilities, and more.
I have said my beads,
made a noise in the morning,
and lain down at night to wrestle.
I will give up a score of ghosts before my time and yet never be able to give them up so cleanly.
Closing my eyes I see two faces and yours is one.
I would really
like you to stay.
I, like you, stay.

IV

Now the spirit has lifted itself and moving its great white form it goes screaming through the house.
I have closed the windows, turned the lock in the door, and putting my foot heavy upon the stairs I know that I must carry always within me the ghost of the whole humanity.
When there is only fading light
I will darken the rooms with my great shadows.

When there are no more sounds

I will listen to him in the earth.

TO A POET

I have often seen you in the morning and have seen you in the evening and have seen you in the night.
 I have seen you in the light and have seen you in the dark.
 I have seen you in the sun and have seen you in the moon.
 I have seen you in the stars and have seen you in the rain.
 I have seen you in the wind and have seen you in the snow.
 I have seen you in the fire and have seen you in the ice.

I have seen you in the world and have seen you in the soul.
 I have seen you in the heart and have seen you in the mind.
 I have seen you in the body and have seen you in the spirit.
 I have seen you in the flesh and have seen you in the bone.
 I have seen you in the blood and have seen you in the marrow.
 I have seen you in the nerve and have seen you in the sinew.

TO A POET

I have often lain beneath the warming sky and read within the gold and bound book the ashen words you wrote, the eyes that took a cloud of white dogwood from the mind, and within the pale leaves cause them bind a sometimes idea of gifts from the sky to rock-strong images dancing in your eyes, and hard crystal tears someone cried.

This day I see you walking in an unbound book, your soft feet tracing black eyes, graphing the new ideas of your age.
At night, and by the arms of the round moon, we see you running--the moon and I, a young faun across the unwritten page.

THE VIOLIN MAKER

You, working in wood with chisel and knife, know the feel of soft maple growing in your hands.
Fingers that carve flagrant bouts are worn on the ends from ceaseless rubbing. You smell, as your shop, of lacquers and varnish. Your nails are not clean.
Ole Bull and Paganini have long ago put you beneath them. And while young men in orchestras sing praises only to Cremona's masters, aspiring to one day finger the prize, you put all worlds beneath their hands.

IN SPRING A YOUNG MAN FANCIES TURNS

It came from nowhere, poised, tilted, bent, and slept in me.
Concordant zithers made strains, unbelievable joy, and melted guise.
How is it that suffering comes so easy?
That we can one day wake, find it spring,
and wont to change, let it be?

Perhaps it is not, as they say, time but is space where we are confined.
We live through endless summers here (I hear Rio is nice this time of year).
It isn't time I'd like to change but space we live in I'd like to rearrange.

REFRACTION

I hold you close up before me.
Hearing the wind blow gently through your eyes.
Gently whistling through the hollow orbs.
How is it that you are so transparent?
Perhaps the world has fallen on you.
Flattening off the edges.
Hurling pieces from your front and back.
Forward and backward in time.
Leaving only you and the transparency of the moment that is only now and yet always was as you always were, and I.
Holding you close up before me your eyes are a mirror.

CLAUDE FINKLESTEIN, B.A., M.A., Ph.D. (SOB)

SPEAKS TO HIS BETROTHED

Come under the arbor, my love, where hyacinths are rooted in an ardent mixture of lime and potash.
Do not fear the blackness of my cloak, one grows old by degrees and it is cool in my garden under the arbor.
I will not speak of your beauty, for being honor bound to speak the truth, I must confess that an orthodontist could have promised more to your face than Helena has been able to think of yet.
But, come with me under the arbor and I will love you and kiss your forehead--not your lips-- for in your forehead, my love, is your brain.

REDUCTIO AD ABSURDUM

If you had died before I met you I would have known you still reaching beyond voids of unfathomable space I would have marked you venerate in the night air, a mythical salamander singing from the solstice and I would have listened.

If I had not seen your eyes I would have already known how the dark towers crumble year after year, unrolling into millenniums of decay, shaping unshaped pools of ruin (like your eyes) a broken urn filled with rancid wine.

If you had not spoken I would have heard through aeons the shriek of wings in the air heavy with death.

If I had not listened I would have understood how it is that only through you I desire death. Only your words falling down on my eyes, lips, breasts, desire me to be wholly dead.

If I had not carried the loyal disease of you in my blood for eternity I might not have thought of what it would be like if wings were white and Angels wore them.

In the game I see
 the lights of the city
 below me flashing in dappled streams on my window.
 I watch the flickering red, green, redemptive in the night air while I am alone here, listening and waiting—waiting for you to come with your large eyes and with your soft lips whisper me to sleep.
 The rain stops. It is late and the tower bells are alone their musical rounds.
 In the deserted streets I wait you under the still waiting sky as the city stirs in hushed sleep and is now prepared to find that once again like a hundred years and never say a word.

EVENING SONG

In the pane I see
the lights of the city
below me flashing in rippled rivers on my window.
I watch the flickering red, greens, seductive in the night air while
I am alone here, listening and waiting--
waiting for you to come with your large eyes
and with your mute lips whisper me to sleep.
The rain stops. It is late and the tower bells cry alone their mournful sounds.
In the deserted streets I meet you under the still morning sky as the city stirs in bestial sleep and we are perplexed to find that some can live a hundred years and never see a dawn.

A SAD TALE

The very uncommon wealth of a young woman of cambridge lead a certain Duluth boy to pursue the ivories at harvard and bringing down the hall was made quite contrite and artistic and played for miss cambridge's lawn parties to delight the cabots until a lute player from Kansas City hit an unusual high C and the people of cambridge threw the cod stinking into the street--stinking all the way to Minnesota.
jesus, he even drank lemon with his tea.

AT WIDOW'S WALK--CAPE COD, MASS.

I wore white brocade while the seas still sang across the rock-filled shores.
Running bareheaded to the spray I shouted your name above the waves with pebbles in my mouth.

Here there are no seas of glory.
No shellfish lying crush-taceated on the green slime.
There are just the imprints of soft feet on warm beaches
and the stone walls that keep the sea out.

Once in South Georgia I drove all night in the rain.
The broken line came at me and the tires humped click-click over the asphalt road.
The radio was blaring a song from Nashville,
The pavement slipped by,
The white line still kept coming.

Here corpses are singing in the deeps.
They are singing your name and I am thinking of you.

SONG OF SAPPHO'S LOVER

By a sea cave I found her not as I had expected,
with fish eyes and bleeding mouth, but rather lying serenely on the rocks her twisted red hair filled with salt spray and catching sea things.

The textbooks would describe her act as inevitable.

A loss of contact with reality they would say, and yet her small white arms resting quietly in the sand showed no signs of a last struggle. Her whole body gave the appearance of complete resignation and now lying silent in the rocks and sand she spoke from every pore, and I, not being able to hear turned once again to the shore.

Soon the rescue squads and curious public opinion will race wildly
over the sand,
by the sea,
across the rocks,
stooping over me they will wonder at you singing to the waves,

a song with no words, of a girl with long white arms and sea things in her hair.

THE FIGHTING MAN

The stately house of Branden looked over the clouds of peach blossoms rising from the red mud of Memphis and held within the Roman columns a slender lady and a tall young fighting man.

The girl stood in the Western gate tears rained from her eyes-- tears for Colonel Talbot riding off to war.

In Mississippi a young officer slept too freely, contracted syphilis and died. While over painted cups in Memphis, the lady told of how Colonel Talbot lead the charge at Vicksburg, and defended, with her ivory arms, the dignity of his name.

Two men met in Virginia and at Branden the moonlight crept across the polished floor to stare at the dead young fighting man lying in state.

By late fall the peach trees lay on their sides with naked roots pointed to the sky.

DECEMBER FROST

The air was light as we came from the lake that December day, our skates thrown over our shoulders.
The blades striking together were the only sounds in the frozen air.

But from an icy limbed maple a bird's voice drifted over the quiet
snow to leave a song unknown to us in the stillness.

Now twenty long winters snows are piled upon my head and the only sound I long to hear more than your voice is a bird's song across a December frost.

ON FIRE

I do not understand
the smell of a fire
that claims the quick responsiveness of the child, or the heat that presses the chest out until the lungs burst spilling their invisible contents on the charred floor.

I cannot understand
the flames that dance macabre and crack their long bony hands fulgurating in the dark sky while your hollow eyes cry out their grief to Mnemosyne and turn again to the cave.

SOMETIMES WHEN I'M LONELY--

I THINK I MIGHT FORGET.

With arms bleeding flowers stolen hurriedly from the busy park, I came to reconcile my wrath and place them on your still white coffin.

FOR LYDIA

Far more beautiful was she than any antique flower vased by ivory hands in cold indifference.

But one was who caressed her petals in moonstruck hours and longed to take her from the green bough in pure severance.

But he tarried so long in books and letters that his lingering spirit would have made a tortoise weep for she became a woman growing old and far better men than he helped close her eyes in sleep.

Now the dark figures come crying above her head vehemently saying how all had loved her kind heart and yet none but he would think how heavy wreaths press on the dead
and how soft a flower of ivory feels upon the dark.

PASSUS

Days weigh heavy on me.

Time marches up and down the pages of the book I read.

The ink that spills from my pen writes Time and is smeared by the warmth of my hand.

In the act of creation is destruction.

Below me the small village stirs.

The priests lie down from Matins in their cool beds and sleep. Outside the brown figures travel under the chapel bells--their heads lowered--their thick lips whispering adorations.

Time is a stalking tiger-- crawling through the high grass toward the sheep that stands bleating in the meadow.

"Ecce agnus Dei."

I only know that time can no more contain me than the bronze arms that close in the night may cause me to capitulate my dreams of hollow eyes.
For ten more chronicles of history would find me as empty as I am today.

SELF-LAMENT

Ibycus can't hear cranes.

Neither can I hear your words when I am silenced by thoughts
I hold of you.

Sometimes your young laughter basks on laureled mountains and I remember many nights spent in silence under the warmth of hurdling stars.

I cannot bear to listen to the frail words you speak. To touch you is to touch Dryope. I cannot abide you.
I am too full of your wondrous heart.

THE DISORDERING OF JUDITH

When Judith lived among the painted cups, trying to hold at bay the old vulgarian, it was all her small hands could do to make him fall exactly at her hem and keep him sighing at charms that had all but ceased from dying in lovely dainty Judith. But words are small and even old men in love sometimes seemed tall to Judith whose love was really in the trying.

And now the only leaves that hang are gold and frozen as the fingers on Judith's wrist.
But do not blame dear Judith's rage to try.
If what they say at tea is true, when old, lovely Judith understood all of this,
but, dying, pleaded to be told why.

THE FOUNTAINS IN WINTER

Long lines of snow across the sky leaving its empty field scattered seeds, the grass, black and white (through it is dark and today like yesterday) beside

A NON-ESOTERIC REVELATION

If, my lady, the intricate patterns in the variations of loving have displeased you--do not be overly disturbed.
 A monument ago a sister whiter than snow closed her thighs and moved to a plot six by six by six and even she sang songs brighter than your eyes.
 Everything goes down in the end and you will go down and I will go down and
 it is no great matter.
 Nobody but nobody
 could sing to the worms like you and me.

THE FOOTHILLS IN WINTER

Long lines of geese cross the sky leaving in maples their deserted nests.
The grass, slick and clean (though it is more dead today than yesterday) bends under a covering of light frost.
Even our little horses are moved by the blaze of color. Your bay has twice nudged the black and moved against her side. The hills humping ever upward fade from scarlet to blue to gold and back again into the intercourse of sun and mountains. A bittern streaks across the sky followed closely by a hawk.
And then the geese come rising, snow clouding, with a rush of wings and long fading cries.
Now gone beyond the hills.
If there is someone who lives in the earth until spring,
I love you.
Do you hear?
I love you.
But, there again, if you are watching, another flight of geese go winging their voices over silent pains in empty mountains.

SESTINA

All night the winds have whirled wild through the streets pushing piles of dead leaves into the shadows making the tops of trees bend like strange spirits incanting the muffled murmurs at our windows of the slowly falling rains that make ourselves tonight, in our warm antique house, prisoners.

I cannot say that not being prisoners we would go out at this hour into the streets slick with rain, to watch an image of ourselves suddenly large, move from unkind dark shadows to reflections of dingy cafe windows that would, one day, have freed our tongues and spirits.

Tonight, determined to sit with our spirits we have let this great house make us prisoners and willfully we lock the door and windows closing out the night, the cold and rainy streets while your familiar voice drifts through the shadows so appreciating this time by ourselves.

Maybe if the roar we hear were in ourselves and not in the alleys, we could be spirits tonight, and not merely the voice of shadows long ago grown weary freeing prisoners of our silent world to descend upon streets where other faceless eyes stare back from windows.

"Put a record on," you said, and the windows of your face made this night with ourselves stretch backward into those impossible streets.
We were more comfortable then when spirits phantasmagoric made welcome prisoners of our hours we watched fade, so like shadows.

That endless fading now moves from night's shadows and slides between us, moans, presses to windows for out. We have made of the hours prisoners and the hours have made prisoners of ourselves.
The night holds us in its hands, such small spirits that we are fearful of even rain in the streets.

Envoy

Prisoners' windows are shadows of ourselves.
Windows make prisoners. Shadows, our spirits, are windows of prisoners, shadows in streets.